

Soul Café
1092 Budapest
Raday u. 11-13 Asztalfo Glalas
www.soulcafe.hu

Reviewed by Katie Zimmerman

Now, I know it's not every day you're searching for a good restaurant in Budapest, but on the off chance you are, I've got just the place for you. The Soul Café appears to be in a trendy part of the city, and James Brown was prominent on the juke box during the evening. Robert and I started with drinks; I had wine and he ordered rum. Boy, was he surprised! The local rum tastes more like bourbon, so he quickly switched to a Konig Pilsner, which he thought was top shelf.

True to form, I started with a bowl of soup. I selected the chicken soup, which was pure heaven. I'm sure it's full of cream and butter and other things that are good for you. Robert had the fried salmon for his main course, and he thought it was delicious. The pasta it came with had plenty of oil and garlic as seasoning. I went with the turkey medallions, and I have to say the potatoes made this dish. The turkey was unbelievably moist, but the mashed potatoes were spectacular. This place is worth the visit if you're ever in the area!

